【原文】M: Last year we were asked to do science experiments. Chemistry, physics and biology are among the choice. Our teacher suggested looking for more ideas in science magazines and books, but I preferred to get the information from the Internet. I often helped my father grow vegetables. So my team decided to study how the weather influenced the vegetable's growth. We had to make our experiment as exact as possible, so we decided to think about whether the rain made a difference to the vegetable size. Then we began to do our experiment. Our teacher pointed out that a single experiment wouldn't be enough. He suggested doing the experiment at least three times, but in the end we only had time to do the experiment twice. When we had written up each part of the growth, we had to design a display for all the experiments. We tried our best to present our information as well as we could. What's more, we had taken lots of photos, but none of the other teams did that! I learned so many new things.
