I first started playing the piano when I was three. My parents are musicians, so they were both very encouraging. It was their dream, I think, to raise a child who could one day become a world-class pianist. So they asked an expensive personal teacher to teach me, and I practiced every day, sometimes for five or six hours at a time. Despite (只管) the long hours and frustration (挫折), I did enjoy it, especially at first, and I was good.

According to my parents and my teacher, I was really excellent, and I was on the road to becoming a professional musician, just like my mother and father.

The trouble was, my head really wasn't in it. My real interest was something quite different —mathematics (maths) . Numbers were the things that really shone brightly in my mind. I found more beauty in a mathematical equation (相等) , I told my parents, than in a piano sonata (奏鸣曲) . So when I went to college, I chose to study mathematics, not music. Then I got a job, working as an accountant.

Now I work with numbers every day. My parents couldn't understand, and even now I guess they are still angry with me. They say I wasted a special gift. But I still believe what I did was right for me.

Matt Mason has seen the future — and it's fun. Mason likes thinking about how machines can make our lives easier by doing the work we hate, such as cleaning. He shows a hard floor cleaning system (系统) that's built into the wall: it will blow dirt to a part of the room where it will be collected by a vacuum (吸尘器). Then the system will drop some cleaner on the floor and an arm will mop (用拖把擦) it up. “This may trouble you,” says Kara, an expert in Mason's company. “But you can program it to come on at 3 a. m., and it will just wet-mop the floor for you.”

When it comes to the kitchen, Bruce Beihoff, another expert at Whirlpool, is sure that in a few years, robots will be doing most of the boring work, freeing us to relax. “More than just fun, future kitchens will be environmentally friendly,” he says. “A new system will be built in the house which can recycle energy (能量) lost from your kitchen to make the whole home warm.”
