Visitors to the zoo usually pity the animals owing to their particular emotional associations. Which animals should be indeed pitied? The first type are those clever and ## developed animals whose lively intelligence and desire for activity can ## no outlet behind the bars of the cage. Those animals living in a free state before ## in the zoo have a strong desire for moving about freely, but have to move around repeatedly in their quarters. Owing to this disappointment, foxes and wolves kept in places which are far too small, are among the most ## of all zoo animals.

Another sad scene, seldom noticed by ordinary zoo visitors, is the ## flying trials of swans at migration time. These creatures, like most other water birds, are generally made unable to fly by the operation of cutting off a tip of the wing bone. ## such swans in the zoo generally seem happy under proper care and they raise their young without any trouble, at migration time things become ##. The birds never really realize that they can no longer fly, and repeatedly swim to the ## of the pond so that they can have the whole extent of its surface when trying to take off against the wind. Meanwhile, their loud flying calls can be heard as they try to ##, and again and again the grand preparations end in failure. I do not like seeing those ## water birds in the zoo. The missing tip of one wing and the still sadder picture that the bird makes when it spreads its wings hurt me badly. What a truly sorry picture it is!

The mind-success connection is strong, and many obstacles to our success are also mental. Some people rely more on facts, while others rely more on feelings. There is no “right way” to be, but we all have the natural ability to “feel” our way successfully ## an unlighted path.

I learned this when I was standing on a curb路(边) in a city in Vietnam. My objective, a restaurant where my husband Tom was waiting for me stood on the ##side of the street, I was hungry and could smell the food. But it seemed as if the restaurant were miles away. The street was ## with motor cycles, bicycles, cars, trucks and buses. Rather than dividing the traffic into two lanes, the yellow lane markers apparently served only to ## that you were on a paved road. People passed, stopped, turned around and crossed center lines. Traffic flowed both ways in the same lane, and more traffic turned onto the street from side ones. Even when the signal light turned red, traffic ## to flow as drivers entirely ignored the signal, rushing to me from front, back, sides and all angles.

I was ready to abandon lunch with Tom when a local gentleman ## my arm. In English, he kindly said, “Crossing the street is not a problem, but a dance.” With that we stepped ## the curb and into the chaos. My heart beat faster as we walked slowly across. ## greeting us with sharp horns and angry shouts, drivers saw and adjusted to us. As long as we made no sudden ##, we were fine. I felt as if we were gracefully swimming through a school of fish. The traffic flowed smoothly around us, in all directions. ## I knew it, we were across. Learning to dance through the chaos of traffic is just astonishing your feelings. It’s a combination of intention, timing and trust.

Many people wrongly believe that when people reach old age, their families place them in nursing homes. They are left in the bodies of strangers for the rest of their lives. Their## children visit them only occasionally; but more often, they do not have any ## visitors. The truth is that this idea is an unfortunate myth of an imaginable story. In fact, family members provide 80 percent of the care those elderly people need. Samuel Preston, a sociologist, studied ## the American family is changing. He reported that by the time the ordinary American couples reach 40 years of age, they have more parents than children. ## because people today live longer after an illness than people did years later, family members must provide long term care. Most psychologists have found that all caregivers ## a common characteristic: All caregivers believe that they are best people for the job. In other words, they all felt that they ## do the job better than anyone else. Social workers questioned caregivers to find out why they took ## the responsibility of caring for an elderly relative. Many caregivers believed they had the obligation to help their relatives. Some stated that helping others ## them feel more useful. Others hoped that by helping ## now, they would deserve care when they became old and dependent. Caring for the elderly and being taken care of can be a ## satisfying experience for everyone who might be involved.
